

The Centre of Attraction To-day at Kaufmann & Co.

EASTER GLOVE SALE

Our glove section is ready to serve your glove needs for Easter. All spring lines have been unpacked, and our showing is complete in every detail.

Washable Gloves

Elite 1-clasp washable gloves with heavy seams; in white and natural.

Price $1.00

French Gloves

Our own importation—Glance Kid of good quality; 2 clasps at wrist; backs are finished with three rows of embroidery; overstitched seams; in black, white and tan.

Price $1.50

Extra good quality

1-clasp washable gloves with heavy seams and black embroidered backs.

Price $1.75

Chevrolet 16-button

washable French chamois with heavy seams; smart and perfect fitting; in white only.

Price $3.00

Elite 16-button

washable French chamois with heavy seams; smart and perfect fitting; in white only.

A Pair $3.50

Glove Section
Main Floor

Kaufmann & Co.

The Store of To-Day and To-Morrow

Social and Personal

The Country Club of Virginia and the Hermitage Golf Club will be the gathering places for smart society this afternoon and evening. Small tea parties will gather for the afternoon at both clubs, and there will be music and informal dancing for several hours later in the evening. Several pretty dinners are scheduled to take place at the Country Club this evening just previous to the regular weekly hop, and the dinner tables will be arranged throughout the main dining room and the sun parlor, and will be decorated with flat bowls of yellow jessamine and mignonette. Both clubs are decorated in spring flowers and have been the scenes of some very delightful informal entertaining throughout the week.

Leaving Baltimore. Miss Belle Willard has returned to her home in this city, after a short visit to Miss Elizabeth C. Hopkins in Baltimore. Miss Willard will go back to Baltimore next Wednesday to remain until after Easter as the guest of Miss Rebecca Hiseok.

Lieutenant George R. Byrd, United States Army, of Fort McPherson, Ga., who has been the guest of his sister, Mrs. J. Lester Shipley Jr., in Baltimore, is now spending a few days with his brother, Richard Evelyn Byrd, in Richmond.

Prominent Wedding. Baltimore exchange contains the following article of interest to Virginia society:

"A wedding of interest here will take place in May, when William Mix Boykin, son of the late Doctor and Mrs. Thomas J. Boykin, of Baltimore, and Miss Evelyn Street, daughter of the late Hon. Justice Street and Mrs. W. P. R. Street, of Toronto, Canada, will be married. Mr. Boykin, who formerly lived in Baltimore, is now a resident of Boston, but will probably make his future home in New York."

Miss Street, who is the guest of Mrs. Josiah Quincy, at her residence in Boston, is an accomplished violinist, and is a member of the American String Quartet. Her father was one of the most prominent men in Canada and was a senator of the University of Toronto, of which he was also a medalist. He was the only nonmilitary man to serve as official visitor to the Royal Military College at Kingston. Because of his judicial service, in which he had gained a high reputation, he was chosen in 1855 by the Canadian government to go to the far Northwest of the country, and was given full powers to settle the disputes and claims arising from the rebellion of the half-breed Indians."

Meeting This Morning. Chesterfield Juniors, United Daughters of the Confederacy, will meet this morning at 11 o'clock at the residence of Mrs. W. E. Drew, 2933 Floyd Avenue. The meeting is a very important one and a full attendance is requested.

Gift to A. E. V. A. Mrs. John A. Coke has presented through Mrs. John T. Hunn, Jr., a very fine life-size etching of Chief Justice Marshall for the Marshall House. The etching was done by Albert Rosenbush, of Philadelphia, and is being painted by Chester Hardin in the Athenaeum, Boston, Mass., and published for the subscribers by the John Marshall Memorial window, which is being placed in Old Church at Williamsburg, in commemoration of the centennial year of John Marshall's appointment as Chief Justice of the United States. A quaint little etching of Brutus Church appears in the corner.

It is only by such gifts as this and others by descendants and friends of this great jurist that the Marshall House can be made a worthy memorial to the distinguished man.

Miss Lee a Bride. The marriage of Miss Elizabeth Fitz Hugh Pickens to Thomas Hilton, of Savannah, took place Wednesday afternoon at half-past 6 o'clock in the Newcomb Chapel, New Orleans. It was a simple and very lovely afternoon wedding. The bride, who was given away by her brother, Dr. Alexander Pickens, by whom she was given in marriage, was attended by four bridesmaids: Miss Lucy Hilton and Miss Berthea Baldwin, of Savannah; Miss Mary Curtis Lee, of Fredericksburg, Va., and Miss Anne Robinson, of New Orleans. All wore charming gowns of pale blue and pale pink chiffon over robes of lace and carried bouquets of pink roses and forget-me-nots. The bride was gowned in white satin with point lace, and carried lilies of the valley.

Acting as ushers and groomsmen were: R. L. Leighton, Jr., of Savannah; Bland Logan and James I. Mills, of New Orleans; Edmund Walker, Strother Jones and David Duryea, Jr., of New York.

Mr. and Mrs. Hilton left at once on their wedding trip. After traveling for some time, they will make their home for the summer at the Hilton residence in Savannah, and will probably begin housekeeping in the fall. The bride's mother, Mrs. John Rose Pickens, was Miss Jessie Alexander, of Augusta, a daughter of the late General E. P. Alexander, and she has many Savannah relatives as well as a number of friends much interested in her marriage to so well known a young Savannah man as Mr. Hilton.

Visiting Mr. Brand. Mr. and Mrs. B. W. Brand arrived in Richmond on Thursday night from Paris, and are visiting John P. Brand at 1 West Franklin Street.

In and Out of Town. Mrs. Eugene Holt has returned to her home in Burlington, N. C., after a visit to friends here.

Miss Marie Perkins, who has been the guest of her aunt in Newport News, has returned to the city.

Judge W. S. Gooch is in the city for a short stay, en route for North Carolina.

Miss Sarah Roller, who has been visiting Mrs. J. B. Rawlins, in Staunton, has returned to the city.

Mrs. G. J. Russell and daughter, of Richmond, are the guests of relatives in Danville.

Mrs. B. Smith and Mr. John Boobal, of Washington, with Mrs. Emma Tokey, of South Centre, Minn., are the guests of A. T. Raglan, at 1419 Grove Avenue.

Mrs. Edwin J. Danely, of Pittsburgh, is a guest at the Jefferson Hotel for a few days, en route to her country home, near Greenwood.

Mrs. George A. Nixey, who has been visiting relatives here this week, has returned to her home in Suffolk.

Miss Lenore Tasley, who has been visiting relative in Huntington, W. Va., has returned to the city.

Miss Helen Christian is the guest of Mrs. Hunt in Washington for several days.

Lieutenant Hodges, United States Army, who has been visiting here for some time past, will leave tomorrow for Yellowstone Park.

Mrs. J. H. Hobson will come to Richmond next week for a short visit to friends.

Richard Hemmer, of "Silver Brook," is spending a few days with relatives in this city.

Mrs. R. R. Powell, of Richmond, has been the recent guest of Mr. and Mrs. Lee J. Gaves in Fredericksburg.

Miss Helen Harris, who has been in Richmond for a few days, has returned to her home in Blackstone.

Mrs. Florence C. Pickrell and Miss Louise Allen have returned to Newport News after a visit to this city.

Mr. Horace Tansill came to Richmond on Thursday, after a short visit to relatives in Fredericksburg.

General William McComb is in the city as the guest of Mrs. C. L. Goodman, of 310 North Meadow Street.

IN FAVOR OF BONDS FOR ROADS.

Chamber of Commerce of Goldsboro Indorses Proposition.

[Special to The Times-Dispatch.]

Goldsboro, N. C., March 14.—The Goldsboro Chamber of Commerce took a special meeting of vital importance to the city and county at the regular monthly meeting last evening. A resolution was passed endorsing the proposition to issue bonds for $100,000 to the city and county for the purpose of providing for good roads leading out of Goldsboro into the county, and aiding adjoining townships to continue these roads to the county line. A resolution was also adopted endorsing a bond issue of $40,000 by the township to build a high school and auditorium. A project to inaugurate a movement for the establishment of an annual fair at Goldsboro was referred to the board of directors for investigation, and as there has been much interest shown it is likely that the project will be launched at an early date.

F. O. Nourse, of Richmond, district superintendent of the Western Union Telegraph Company, has been in the city for several days arranging for a summer telegraph school for the benefit of the boys and girls of the city. Mr. Nourse, who is a graduate of the Polytechnic, and all graduates will be given the same name and title.

Aware of the resentment of his eldest son and the latter's consort towards the princess and appreciating that she would have to suffer after his death, the emperor decided to place his daughter into the life of Zarina Marie, he placed to her credit in foreign banks, notably in the Bank of England, a sum of $25,000,000, so as to provide for her own welfare and that of her children, arranging, however, that she should have entire control thereof.

Her marriage was celebrated on the 14th of the month, and the very private ceremony on leaving her house after luncheon, and before even the emperor took place she was forced by Alexander III. to leave the country, together with her then eleven-year-old son George, her eight-year-old daughter Olga, and her three-year-old daughter Catherine, who was then only three years old, and who was embraced by her father, the ill-fated monarch, before he drove forth to his shocking death.

It has always been thought that one of the principal reasons for the cause of Alexander III. to withhold the grant of the Constitution, which his father was to have signed on the very evening of the day of his assassination, was the fact that it had been drawn up and discussed by him with his armistice-born Premier, General Boris Melnikoff, and in her presence, Boris Melnikoff also was disgraced by Alexander III. at the moment when he was on his way for the part which he had played in assisting instead of obstructing Alexander III's marriage to Catherine Dolgorouka.

After her expulsion, Princess Yourieffska and her children established their residence in France, where she has a mansion in the Avenue Klobet, at Paris, a suburban villa at Neuilly and a chateau near Nice.

In course of time she developed the most extraordinary closeness in money matters. She has been quite the reverse of generous towards her children. The engagement of her daughter Catherine to Boson de Talleyrand-Perigord, son of the Duke de Valencay, was broken off because she declined to give any dowry whatsoever or even to assure a satisfactory allowance, and Boson thereupon married instead, Levi P. Morton's daughter, Helen, who divorced him three years later. Young Catherine afterwards married the late Prince Alexander Bariatinski. But sooner than help him in the financial difficulties in which they eventually became involved, Princess Yourieffska preferred to allow her son-in-law Bariatinski to be gazetted a bankrupt at St. Petersburg, in Italy and in France, and to be sold out.

Several suitable matrimonial alliances for Princess Olga, the eldest daughter, were also broken off in a sensational manner, owing to the niggardliness of her mother in the matter of pecuniary settlements, while as for Princess Yourieffska's only son George, she has restricted his allowance to $25,000 a year, and has repeatedly announced in advertisements throughout the European press that she will not be responsible for any of his debts. Owing to financial difficulties, his wife, Countess Alexandra Czarnekau, a morganatic daughter of the royal Duke Constantine, of Alenburg, left him, securing a divorce and is now married to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.

While so stingy, she is nevertheless a gambler in every sense of the word. Nothing delights her so much as winning small stakes at the public tables at Monte Carlo, while, with the number of speculative, wildcat schemes in which she has invested money, it is amazing that she should still remain as enormously rich as she really is. That she should be willing to risk the publicity and the expense of a suit in New York for the sake of shaving down a lawyer's fee by a matter of $1,000 points in true colors this universally unpopular daughter of Prince Michael Dolgorouka, the name Dolgorouka meaning "long arm," given to a descendant of Saint Vladimir, in the twelfth century on account of his martial prowess.

(Copyright, 1913, by the Brentwood Company)

to the extremely wealthy Leon Narskine.

George was, as a lad, granted a commission in the Russian navy by Czar Alexander III., who took care, however, that he should always be kept at remote stations, and it was as an ensign on a Russian cruiser that he visited the United States at the time of the Columbian celebration in 1893, and took part in the naval review and the land parade at New York, during the visit of the foreign fleets. When Nicholas succeeded to the throne he gave George a commission in the Hussars of the Guard at St. Petersburg, and allowed him, as well as his sisters, to return to Russia, but Princess Yourieffska continues barred from entering, and on one occasion when she attempted to go in, after the accession of the present Emperor to the throne, she was stopped at the frontier by the police on his orders.

The princess endeavored in the early years of her exile to maintain a literary salon in Paris, and sought to set up a species of court in partibus composed of authors, artists, savants and archeologists, culled from the Institute of France. Renan was one of her habitués of her house. But in time her guests became tired of her pretensions, her authoritative ways, and above all, of the constant troubles and unpleasant scenes to which her household was subjected. She was forever being sued by her tradespeople and by her servants, the proceedings entailing revelations of so sordid a character as to rob her of all sympathy and good will, and in the end her house became deserted by her former guests, while her invitations no longer received any response.

Her once wonderful chestnut hair, those charming tresses which she cut off on the Czar's death and laid in his coffin, whence they were cast out by his sons—and which subsequently grew again—now show white. No vestige of her former beauty of face and figure remains. She has become extremely stout and careless in dress, while the blue spectacles which she is obliged to wear on account of her eyes, do not precisely add to her attractiveness.